THE INFORMATIONAL INTERVIEW

The informational interview is an informal discussion with a company that is conducted before the recruiting process has even begun. Usually, you approach an employee of a prospective company and seek his advice about the role or company. Though it's called an informational interview, don't mention the word interview when you talk to the employee. Part of the value of the informational interview is that it's low pressure. An employee can meet with you and offer advice, regardless of whether the company is hiring. She gets to vet you a bit, and you get to evaluate her and her company. These informational interviews are very common across tech companies, both for external applicants and for internal candidates wishing to transfer teams.

Make sure to come with good, well-researched questions. The person will not be evaluating your skills extensively, but he will evaluate your personality, communication, and interest. Make sure to write a note thanking him for his time. After this conversation, the person may invite you to apply to her company and even offer to refer you. If not, you can follow up after the interview and ask her the best way to apply or to get in touch with a recruiter. If she doesn't respond with an offer to help, then she is probably not comfortable doing so for whatever reason. You will simply need to use alternative avenues to apply for the position.
